

What's up

Daily news from the 2012 world appreciative inquiry conference

Harvesting #KSonair

During the conference, four people of Kessels & Smit provided a swinging radio show to the attendees and the outside world. 'It was super fun', they said. 'We felt ourselves somewhere between the conference and the outside world. For example, at one point, we called the newspaper, De Standaard, because they wrote an article on the conference. It was an interesting conversation and different perspectives were shared.' The team also received tweets from Sweden, Georgia, Armenia and Denmark!

There were other wonderful moments. There was the anthem contest: India and Japan coming out strong! There were a lot of touching stories. For example, there was the story of a Georgian lady who succeeded in getting money to build a road to the school in a very small village in the mountains. A big challenge for the DJs was to give words and images to what AI really means, how it works and what examples of it look like. The team also was confronted with more solemn insights, into what tough times really look like. 'The challenge seems to be about looking at this reality with honesty. The opportunity is to use our AI knowledge to talk about this and really work with,' they say.

You can find podcasts of the radio shows online. Visit the KSonair website.

Based on an article of Cathy Camertijn – cathycamertijn@hotmail.com - @CathyCamertijn